

and that is here in Dallas. No Artega or Ortego or Artego...
I'll see what I can find on the Klein ad.

A friend of mine was at a party about a week ago and Gerry Hill (the policeman) was there... He felt that he was among "friends" and made the remark that they should all read Investigation of a Homicide... said he wrote it... If you will remember, he was once amusements writer for the Times Herald, so it is possible. This would explain several things. When we first met Judy in February of 1969, the book was in galley proofs. We read it and found so many errors which we pointed out to her that they pulled the book back. When we would point out things to Judy, she would say, "Where did you get that?" We would show her the volumes and it was evident that she had never read them. She finally admitted she didn't have them. From the book, I believe she had some girl doing research at the library in the volumes. I remember that one evening, in Judy's presence, I made the remark that Gerald Hill was high on my list of suspects. She really jumped down my throat and was high in her praise of him...

My luncheon date is here so I must go...
